DAYTON, Ohio, June 8, 1970 --- Mr. James A. Adamitis, Assistant Professor of Police Science at the State University of New York, Farmingdale, will become Director of the University of Dayton's Law Enforcement Program this August. Mr. Adamitis will be in the Department of Political Science. This is another step in the development of this academic program at UD.

Mr. Adamitis, who is 28, has his bachelor's degree in sociology and master's degree in political science, both from Kent State University in 1965 and 1967 respectively. Prior to his position at Farmingdale he had been employed with the Parma, Ohio, Police Department in records and communications.

An honor student in the political science and law enforcement programs at Kent State University, his master's thesis was "The Organizational Framework and Administrative Functions of Local Selective Service Boards." He also has conducted research programs in the law enforcement area.

He has served as lecturer and coordinator for law enforcement programs in New Jersey and New York and was advisor to the Police Science Club at Farmingdale, a social and honorary organization for students enrolled in the Police Science curriculum at the State University of New York, Farmingdale.
